Circumstantial Proof.

Curious Cases in the History of Crime.

The Celebrated Boorn Trial in Vermon Instances Where the Innocent Have Suffered. Perhaps the difficulties in evidence direct and circumstantial, were never more strongly shown than in the once celebrated case of the brothers Boorn convicted in Vermont, 1819, of the murder of their brother-in-law, in 1812. It appeared in All Heavy Weight Woolens made to order (for cash only) at testimony that the latter, a half-witted fellow, and a burden to the family, was last seen in a field with the two men, and there had a quarrel, in which he had been struck on the head with a stake, and somehow had finally disappeared from I have also just received a Large Assortment the locality. Seven years after, some bones, supposed to belong to the missing man, one of his buttons and his knife, were found near, in an old cellar in the field, and the men were arrested

Upon their trial they both confessed to the murder, and gave the details, and then immediately appealed to the Legislature to commute their sentence to imprisonment for life. This mercy was only granted to one of them, but the interest of certain gentlemen being aroused by the case, careful search was made and the missing man found in New Jersey, brought back and recognized by all his old companions, These goods were all ordered before the rise and the men were set free. The explanain Woolens, and will be made to order at retion of the singular conduct of the accused is found in the had advice of their friends is found in the bad advice of their friends, who, knowing that public opinion ran strongly against, and thinking it would hang them, advised them to the confession in order that they might get the lighter sentence of perpetual imprisonment.

It was said that the French naturalist, Cuvier, from a single fossil bone, could describe the structure and habits of extinct races of animals. But bones neither lie nor mistake, while witnesses do both, and no court is infallible. The cases are numerous on record to show that even the senses cannot be implicitly relied on, even when the veracity of the witness is unquestionable. In cases of highway robbery a man's face has been repeatedly sworn to from the glimpse got from the light of a gun or pistol flash, whereas accurate experiment always shows the thing to be impossible. In a case of theft, a woman swore a certain gown was hers; being asked by a juryman to try it on, it was found not to fit at all, and she confessed her mistake. The fact was, that the prisoner had stolen the gown from a neighbor, though this was found out only after the acquittal. Another woman, being robbed, swore a certain black pocket-book found on a man arrested for the crime, was hers, which would have sent him to the gallows had not a countryman found another black pocket-book while reaping, and hastening to the trial, the same witness find ing all, and her very money safe, confessed she was mistaken, and the accused went free. A signature to a certain deed was sworn to by respectable and honest parties deed in his life. In a celebrated Scotch trial, for forgery, intricate and far-reaching, and which involved the title to one of Talent and Skill. the best estates in the realm, half a dozen engravers swore that certain numerous letters were written by different persons, though the prisoner afterward confessed h wrote them all. His conviction was partly insured by a sharp lawyer noting that, in all the documents, certain words were curiously misspelled, and, on the prisoner being required, in open court, to write these words, he misspelled them as they were written down in documents purporting to have been penned by many different persons, living even in half a dozen different generations. In a murder trial, a piece of rope found near the victim was sworn to as the same kind of rope as a piece found in possession of the acccused, a bit of testimony which would have hung him had not a ropemaker examined and testified that one its mark behind it, which, rightly interpiece was twisted to the right while the other was twisted to the left. A halfdozen witnesses swore that they saw a certain person at a certain hour of the clock. Being asked to say what time it was by a clock in the court room not one of them could tell. This was a case of downright lying to prove an alibi. An eminent English lawyer swore positively to two men who, he said, robbed him in broad daylight. It was proved that at the time of the robbery they were so far off as to make the thing impossible. Shortly after the true robbers were taken with the stolen goods on them. The presecutor then confessed his mistake, and is said to have given a money value to the men whom he came very near sending to the gallows. Besides, accused persons often behave very strangely, even when innocent. Some run away, which, in old times, was held so sure a proof of guilt that, in England in cases of felony and treason, flight carried forfeiture of goods, whether inno-cent or guilty. It is now in proof that innocent persons, timid or ignorant, or ill-advised, when accused of crime often wife seems to have been a woman of easy run away and do a great many other foolish things. Daniel Webster, in the famous murder trial at Salem, spoke the famous epigram, "Suicide is confession," a very fine sentence, but very poor law, since even innocent persons, falsely accused, have often died by their own hand to escape further misery. Sir Edward Coke tells of an uncle bringing up his orphan niece, and had had her lands for fee until she came to sixteen years. When eight or nine, her uncle correcting her, she was heard to say "Oh, good uncle, kill me not." At this time the child disappeared and could not be found. The uncle, arrested on suspi Fearing what might happen to him, if he failed, he brought another child, very like the true one, into court. The cheat was discovered, and the man hanged. But the child had only run away into another county, and been taken in by hospitable strangers, and, at sixteen years of age, came back and claimed her property.

Now, proof, as defined by the lawyers, is only a presumption of the highest order. Cunning is but a sinister or crooked wis dom, while human nature in the court room often turns out to be a singular and fallible element in the attempted equation of justice. We cannot be surprised, therefore, that so many innocent persons have suffered, and, upon the whole, the wonder is that so many of the guilty are punished. Yet, appearances may be very strong against a man, and yet he be innocent. In 1827 Thomas Gill was convicted in England of stealing two oxen.

don. About 3 o'clock in the morning, he met a man, riding on a pony and driving two oxen, who offered Gill five shillings to drive them to London, and agreeing to meet him on Westminster bridge. The young man, willing to earn an honest penny, agreed, and was arrested shortly the word this, he will see a little what they after, with the cattle in his possession, by the owner in hot pursuit. Arrested, he might be made to mean.) After some evasions, he finally broke down and congave a false name to conceal his situation was on the point of being transport-

The simple fact was, that the real thief, hotly pursued, had taken this cruel way to rid himself of the cattle and the crime, were found, adding that Clark's head lay In France, a young man was in the ser- to the right in the turn at the envice of an old woman and had a key to trance to the cave. A man assailed by a robber struck him in the face with a key. A mark on the prisoner's face corresponded with the wards or divisions of the key. Convicted. In 1752, in England, a man and woman from within a certain house gave the alarm that some one had entered and murdered an inmate. The dow on the grass outside the house was found to be undisturbed. The living inmates were convicted. In 1816, in England, a man was tried for the murder of another, where the struggle had been severe. Impressions were found, in the clay, of a man who had worn breech of striped corduroy, patched with the same material; but the patches were not set on straight, the ribs of the patch meeting the hollows of the original corduroy. The accused was shown to have his breeche as Lord Eldon's, but Lord Eldon came into patched thus, and this greatly aided his court and swore that he never attested a conviction. Dew and snow have often helped to track the murderer, and many a man has perished on the gallows the peculiarity of whose shoes, or the curious way in which nails are set in them, aided conviction. A man arrested in his bed, who claimed to have been there all night, was found with wet, muddy stockings on. The night was wet and the ground outside soft. Convicted and executed. One of Kaulbach's illustrations of Goethe's Reineke Fuchs shows us the fox murdering the hare. It is a solitary place, a field and close by a shrine with its cross. But curiously enough, the artist has put eyes into every head of the full wheat, which bends in the breeze, and every flower at hand is made in likeness of a dim, human face, which beholds the deed with horror. The fact thus symbolized is that nature, in all its attributes of weight, size color and condition is, after all, the head detective of crime, and every secret murder leaves preted of men, metes out detection and punishment to the criminal. "Murder will out," because, in most subtle ways, the circumstance of murder being accurate, when wisely interpreted, confess and denote with unerring finger, and "dead men do tell tales," with a hundred That the guilty sometimes tongues. evade detection does not prove the contrary. Perhaps the old story of the murderer, Eugene Aram, whose horrors have passed into English literature, assisted by the genius of Hood's shadowy poem of that name, best illustrates what has been said of the curiosities of circumstantial evidence in criminal causes. Aram was born at Ramsgill, Yorkshire, 1704, and, though the son of a gardener, was of ancient British family and brilliant genius. With scant education in youth, and serving for a time as book-keeper in London, yet he managed to make such progress in learning, especially in mathematics, that he was invited back as schoolmaster to his native village, and there married. His virtue, and to have made his home unhappy. But he devoted himself to the study of the classics-Hebrew, Chaldee and Arabic-and became so much of a philologist as to bestow much labor in comparing these languages with the ancient Celtic. While engaged apparently in such honorable undertakings, he found time, Feb. 8, 1744, with the help of a confederate, Richard Houseman, to murder one Daniel Clark, a shoemaker, and conceal his body. His motive, as Aram alleged after his trial, was revenge on his wife' paramour, but it was in evidence that he got from his crime the whole of Clark's wife's dowry, to the amount of £160. In fact, Aram looks, when viewed in the most candid light, to have been one of those hypocritical and cold-blooded villians of ability who sometimes appear to disgrace humanity. Fourteen years after the murder, a peasant, digging stones for a lime kiln in the neighborhood, found a human skeleton two feet below ground, with the frame so well kept together as to enable it to be seen that the body had been never been a seen alive since 1744, and as Aram's wife had formerly thrown out dark hints that he had been murdered, public suspicion was aroused, and an inquest was held upon the bones. At this nquest she was summoned, and testified that she thought Clark was murdered by Aram and Houseman. When brought before the coroner, Houseman was in great confusion, trembled, changed color, and faltered in speech under examination. He had just finished his apprenticeship to a butcher, and, after paying a visit to his uncle in the country, in order to save exupone on foot back to Lon-The coroner desired him to take up one no more Dan Clark's bone than it is mine." MESSRS. WEEKS & POTTER: Gentlemen.—I feel it a duty to inform you, and through you all who are interested to know the fact, that a most disagreeable and obstinate case of Salt Rheum or Eczema, which has been under my personal observation from its first appearance to the present time,—about ten (10) years,—covering the greater portion of the patient's body and limbs with its peculiar irritating and itching scab, and to which all the known methods of treating such disease has been applied without benefit, has completely disappeared, leaving a clean and healthy skin, under a few days of profuse application of Cuticura.

I can and do heartily advise all similarly afficted to try the remedy which has been so effectual in this case.
